Online and Paper Apps Siblings of the Same Family

by Becky Dean

In order to get an interview with an airline, you must first apply. Sounds simple enough—but is it? It would be nice if we could get the job without having to jump through all of the proverbial hoops, but we can't. Life is never that easy. Understanding the "how-to's," however, can make this process a lot less painful and laborious.

When the first online application systems made their debut, I was really excited about this new way of applying to an airline. I soon found out that the technology I was comfortable with made others quite nervous. I also discovered that much of what I had been preaching and teaching for years about the traditional paper applications, also applied to the online versions as well.

Résumés and employment applications give airline recruiters a way to learn about you before they meet you. You make an impression, good or bad, by your initial presentation of your paperwork. This holds true for online applications as well. How so? Well, first of all, following directions precisely as required is critical. Not doing so usually results in your information not being processed.

The online forms usually indicate what fields are required with a red asterisk (*) by the text box in question. Pretty foolproof, I would say. However, there are always exceptions. Take the UPS online application for example. It requests that you paste your résumé into a text box even if you have provided similar line item information directly off of your résumé. (JetBlue requests you both download and paste your résumé online.) I know of individuals who have chosen not to paste their résumé in the requested spot because they decided it might be redundant. Well, maybe that's why they haven't heard from the airline. You MUST paste your résumé there even if it seems repetitive to you. And therein lies one of the many similarities about both types of applications, online or paper: Never second-guess the application because you will, in most cases, rarely guess in your favor. Fill out all blanks and text blocks. If the company is requesting information it must be important to them as it relates to evaluating your candidacy for an interview. Need I say more?

Some online applications, such as Alaska's and Southwest's, conduct an initial online assessment to determine if you are even qualified to complete the online forms. This mini-assessment ensures you meet the minimum qualifications before going further. If you don't, then you will not be allowed to keep going. By the way, this also happens with paper applications sent through the mail.

All of the online application systems require that you have an email address. They offer suggestions for obtaining a free email from services such as Yahoo! and others. Once again, whether or not a company has an online system, more and more airlines are opting to have candidates send them résumés by email. A few words of advice here are in order: Make sure that you choose a conservative email address. I have seen many that are not appropriate for business activities. Remember what I said about how impressions can be made sight unseen: Your email address alone will send the right or wrong message to the recipient. Don't risk having your email dragged to the trash unread because the sender address or subject line may be misconstrued as spam.

When uploading your résumé as an attachment or sending it as attached file by email, it must be in Microsoft Word format. This would be a file name with a .doc affixed to the end. MS-Word is the standard used by businesses worldwide and sending a résumé and cover letter formatted in MS Word ensures that the file can be downloaded and opened by the recipient. If you are using a program such as MS Works, Word Perfect, or any other non MS Word program, you run a 99% risk that your file will not be downloadable or readable at the other end. You may need to purchase a version of MS Word and this should be considered a part of your job search budget—so make the investment. Ultimately it is your responsibility to do what is necessary to ensure that your information is properly communicated and delivered. Your efforts here could mean the difference between getting or not getting the interview.

Another important element to consider when pasting your entire résumé into a text block as requested by UPS and JetBlue, is that it must be formatted so that it can be read by the end user. If you simply copy and paste your standard résumé, you will lose much of the formatting and alignment and the result will be a mess of scrambled up words that can't be linked up (i.e., read) with any useful information. To avoid this, take your standard résumé and remove all of the formatting so that you end up with a single column of information all aligned with the left margin. I call this a straight text résumé. Don't worry about your résumé not looking as good or breaking onto two or more pages. It is functionality we are after here... that's what is important.

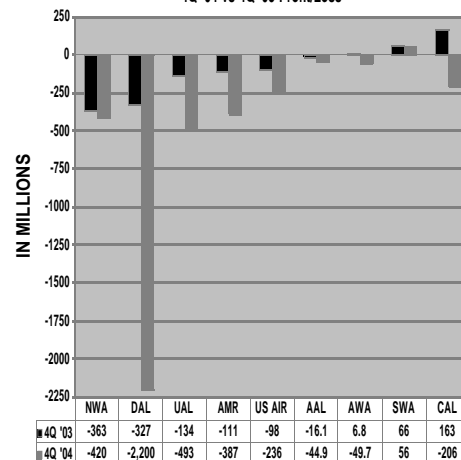

Finally, let's not forget about the importance of keeping your file updated. Not only does updating your file help you maintain the most current information concerning your qualifications, but almost equally important is that doing so shows desire and persistence. FedEx for example, checks to see who has updated and they assume the person is not interested if they haven't updated in a couple of months! It also lets the airline recruiter know that you are still in the market and available for hire. With a paper application, it might be prudent to update every three to six months, or immediately when anything significant has changed such as your contact information or having reached a milestone in your flight time or certificates. You can update more frequently online without penalty. Airlines can and do monitor the frequency of these updates—both online and paper. So let them know you are out there, available, motivated, and ready to interview by updating your files on a regular basis.

There are so many things that can go wrong and right during this process. Believe it or not, you control many of things that can go right—especially at the stage of your job search when you are first applying. Making the right impression online or through the mail will follow you to the interview. It will set the tone for your first meeting and launch the interview in the right direction from the very start. Your actions will speak louder than your spoken words. As a matter of fact, all the recruiters can assess until they meet you are your actions. So make them count. Getting the interview depends on it.
